Politics and Sociology in the Thought of Max Weber

Green crime is a fast-moving and somewhat contested area in which academics, policymakers and practitioners frequently disagree not only on how green crimes should be defined but also on: the nature of the criminality involved; potential solutions to problems of green crime; and the content and priorities of policy. Within ecological justice discourse, for example, there may be agreement that harms to the environment and non-human animals must be addressed. But debates continue over whether green crimes are best addressed through criminal justice systems or via civil or administrative mechanisms.
